Abstract

Ever since its inception in 1992, Rotational Echo Double Resonance (REDOR) technique remains the most widely employed pulse sequence to date for measuring heteronulear dipolar interactions in solid-state NMR. In this thesis, our objective is to develop an analytic framework based on Average Hamiltonian Theory to understand its implementation at faster spinning frequencies.